Overall, we were all shocked by the lifestyle and treatment that goes on to create these clothing items. We care about items, but don't care about how we obtain them or what people go through to make them. We all decided that we will definitely reuse old clothes and shop secondhand stores. We're also going to be more conscious when we are wanting to buy items that we will probably only wear a few times. We were also horrified by what happens in India, like the sweatshop collapsing. We need to change the way to produce our clothes. We're no longer separated countries, we're a global system that should be working to care about all workers, no matter where they're located. We can't just let people live like that.

Also, we were angered at all the pesticides, in the cotton fields, in India that are causing massive amounts of retardation, cancers, and birth defects in their children. In the documentary she said that the same companies that make the chemicals to put on the crops are the same owners of the companies who sell the medicine for when people get sick. It doesn't matter to the companies, because they will make money no matter what happens. Which is just disgusting. We are all going to look into People Tree Clothing and find more ways to support it, and I am on the board for an eco-friendly fashion show in April. This will help inform people about Fair Trade and what changes they need to make.
